Re: Construction Site Manager (Power Generation)

Every job site runs on the same few things. The trades need a clear daily plan, the sequence has to hold, and somebody has to catch the quality and safety problems before an inspector does. That's the field work I've built my career on, and it's why this Eagle Mountain project caught my eye.

Most recently I ran residential construction jobs start to finish for a Lehi home builder. I put construction SOPs in place, added inventory tracking and an equipment maintenance program, managed the vehicle fleet, and set up quality and safety controls on our sites. Before that I scheduled crews and coordinated up to ten contractors on remodeling jobs. I started out in the field as a concrete foreman running ground crews, then spent two years in an industrial fabrication shop rolling boiler pipe. As a PMP, I keep schedules, documentation, and progress reports clean for whoever I answer to.

But I'll be straight about the gap. I haven't built a power generation facility, and most of my site leadership has been residential. What I'd bring is energy industry experience from ION Solar and Lion Energy, plus a habit of making progress visible and fixing field issues fast. The 12 to 24 month commitment works well for me. Could we talk this week about how Epcon runs its sites?

Sincerely,

Eric Howes
