Hiring Manager
Manly Bands

Re: Director of Operations

Growing brands usually feel it first in the warehouse. Returns pile up, nobody knows why a product keeps failing, and customer service ends up absorbing the cost. Fixing that kind of problem is the work I've done best.

At Lion Energy I worked between our warehouse, engineering team, and manufacturers in China and Vietnam. We were handling about 10,000 partner returns a year, and a single root cause investigation could take months. I wrote clearer receiving and inspection procedures, tightened up barcode tracking, and got everyone looking at the same defect data. Investigations dropped to about a week. Resolution time fell roughly 50%, yearly RMAs fell 10%, and we estimated $100,000 in first year savings. Before that, I helped grow a Vivint support team from about 20 people to more than 50, then designed training for hundreds of sales partners.

But what draws me to Manly Bands is the mix. Warehouse, manufacturing, quality, and customer support under one leader is how I like to work, because the fixes usually live in the handoffs between them. I'm a PMP, I've owned a team budget, and I'm ready to help you scale without slowing down the people making the rings. Can we find time next week to talk?

Sincerely,

Eric Howes
