Re: Quality Engineering Supervisor

Returns data only matters when it reaches the people who can fix the part. That's the problem I spent most of my time at Lion Energy working on, and it's the heart of the field quality job you've posted in Lehi.

Lion's partner return operation handled about 10,000 units a year. When I started, a root cause investigation could take months. I improved intake, barcode tracking, and defect documentation so engineering and our manufacturers in China and Vietnam had something they could act on. Investigations dropped to about a week. Return to resolution time fell roughly 50%, yearly RMAs fell 10%, and partner returns fell 15% over several months. We estimated about $100,000 in first year savings on processing, storage, and labor.

I've also spent years putting KPIs in front of leadership, first coordinating a four person analytics team at Vivint and later as a product owner at Aptive. But what pulls me toward ADI is the product. I've sold and supported smart home systems, and I know what a failed device costs an installer and the customer behind them. I'd like to walk you through how I'd run quality holds and returns across your regions. Could we set up a call next week?

Sincerely,

Eric Howes
